Around one third of the world is covered with forests; according to the United Nations and the environmental organization WWF, the global woodlands are decreasing steadily. Woods are deforested for agriculture, animal husbandry and timber trade, or suffer from invasive alien species. The loss of land has serious consequences, as the ecosystems are essential for humans, animals and plants, and are home to the world's largest biological diversity. Aiming to raise awareness for the importance of forests, the International Forest Day has been taking place on March 21 annually since 2013. Forests protect against natural disasters by reducing the risk of floods, droughts, and landslides. They offer places to recreate, help the health, fix roots in the soil and also secure jobs, serve the climate as well balance the oxygen, CO2 and humidity in the air. Therefore, it is very important far-sighted personalities and institutions are committed to the preservation and reforestation of woodlands.
