We're constantly thinking about the next adventures we want to check off our bucket list. While it might seem hard to top the amazing trips from 2019 (wellness vacations! underwater hotels! zodiac trips!), we have a feeling 2020 will be just as epic (if not more so). The new year's travel trends have a

Responsible and sustainable tourism continues to be on the rise, with major efforts being made in every aspect of lodging, all without giving up the pampering end of things. More travelers are choosing to stay at boutique-style eco-lodges that not only provide luxury accommodations, amenities, and in-house curated excursions, but also give back to the community where they dwell in a sizable way. Whether donating funds to local programs designed to assist the surrounding region or commissioning local artists for the hotel decor, a lot of positive things are happening in the eco-lodge realm.

Where to go: The Inkaterra lodges in Peru offer an authentic experience with all the cultural elements and attention to detail that boutique hotels do, and are family run to boot. Not only that, but Inkaterra is an NGO with a number of incredible projects to help the environment and local communities. Each property manages to immerse guests while incorporating natural elements of the region in which the various lodges inhabit. In Indonesia, Nihi Sumba Island promises "rugged luxury." The property might be beachfront, but its most shining qualities are that of the foundation it runs, aiming to lessen poverty on the island. They work hard to provide aid for access to clean water, creating educational opportunities, and several other notable community efforts.
